It will loop for ever, unless your brain finally decides it's time to take a rest. Its Chromecast friendly, though you can also use it via desktop version. Trouble is, it's not a very polished product. Some of its features are nice, like the ability to trim your videos, but overall the user interface isn't great. The website isn't very responsive and it's definitely a bit rough. But, as I said, it has a lot of features, so you can still do all the work using the desktop app. Feature-wise, it's got everything from basic video editing to advanced tools for specific purposes. You can add music and narration, add timelapses, auto-chroma key, create screensavers, record screen, add slow motion, add various effects and even add emoji. You can also use your webcam as the background image for the screen saver. All videos are hosted on Google Drive, so you can access them anywhere you're logged in. The chromecast version has native playback for iOS and Android, though it's buggy and sometimes plays back segments of a looped video. It's not great, but it's pretty neat for the price. Adobe Premiere Clip If you don't have the skills to do your own video editing, but you do have the skills to save a video file in a Flash player, then this is for you. Premiere Clip is a Flash-based video editor that does all the basic video editing work for you. It's actually a fairly bare-bones app, but the basic features work well. It can trim, cut and add music. It also has motion effects, like black and white, greyscale and sepia, so if you want to add some colour to your video. It's got a fairly easy-to-use interface, and the user experience is pretty nice. It's pretty basic, but it does a few things pretty well. The fact that it saves to Google Drive means you can access the video anywhere you are. It's got the basic features of any video editing app, and you can even add a playlist to the video. The best part about this app is the chromecast support, and it plays beautifully on the Chromecast. You can 82157476af
